Global Colloquium on Participant-Centered Learning

To sustain success, business schools must adapt their learning models and curricula while retaining distinctive methods and traditions. Gather with peers in this two-session colloquium to explore innovative teaching and course design. You’ll prepare to improve management education in your classroom and across your institution.

WHO SHOULD ATTEND

Participating institutions are encouraged to invite full-time, senior business faculty members who have case teaching, case writing, and industry experience; are committed to innovation; and are well positioned to influence instructional development and learning strategies across their institutions. Open only to educators who have been nominated by a participating institution.

WHAT YOU WILL LEARN

Your first session takes place on the Harvard Business School (HBS) campus. For the second three-day session, you can choose one of two locations—the HBS campus or a site outside the United States.

Designed to foster your growth as a teacher, course developer, and change agent, this program models and examines the nature of participant-centered learning. Through faculty presentations, case studies, workshops, simulations, and small-group discussions, you will explore various methods for teaching, case research, curriculum development, and case writing.

• Exploring how people learn and how strong teachers teach
• Determining when the case method is and is not appropriate
• Evaluating and applying different curriculum development methodologies
• Preparing and executing your teaching strategy
• Questioning, listening, offering feedback, and developing a strong relationship with the class
• Conducting field-based research
• Maximizing synergy among research, case writing, and teaching
• Continuing to learn and develop as leaders and teachers
• Integrating economics, ethics, and the institution
• Introducing participant-centered learning, including strategies, support requirements, and political responses
